Thirst 4 Blood: Episode 2: Devil In A Blue Dress Dimitri Dragone

In literature, a serial is a publishing format by which a single large work, most often a work of narrative fiction, is presented in contiguous (typically chronological) installments—also known as numbers, parts, or fascicles—either issued as separate publications or appearing in sequential issues of a single periodical publication.

The idea of stories being told in serial form dates back to at least the One Thousand and One Nights (Arabian Nights), which consisted of a series of serialized stories, or "serialized novels" or novellas. Its frame story is about Scheherazade telling stories to King Shahriyar, and she needs to keep him interested in each of the stories, to prevent his executing her the next morning. She often tells the stories in a series, beginning each story with a narrative hook, leaving off with a cliffhanger, and continuing the story the next night. This leaves the King in suspense, waiting until the next night to hear what will happen next. Many of her tales often stretch over many nights or episodes.

Devil In A Blue Dress is the second installment of the Thirst 4 Blood, a paranormal romance in serial format, in the mode of all serial writers of the past, a compilation of multiple short stories that will be made available over time. The story will build over time, so be sure to read them all in order!

In this segment, Madison meets Rebecca in a most unusual way and he saves her from being beheaded by a mysterious being.

“Why are you out here?” Rebecca asked.

“I...I came to help you.”

"She blushed. 'That's noble. You're some kind of knight, huh? Racing to the damsel in distress?'"

“Something like that.”

"She attempted to stand up and then staggered, more or less just falling into his arms as opposed to getting on her feet. She clutched his arms and he saw that she was bruised. In the dark light it looked like a black infection overtaking her forearm.

"She winced and looked up into his eyes, intending to thank him again. Instead, she lost herself in his gaze. Madison wanted to pull away, fearful that his gaze, which had enthralled many victims over the years, would place her into an unnatural state of mind. He didn't want that for her. She wasn't a victim.

"She wasn't a meal.

"She was more than that.

“I...’ she started to say, but she had been trapped into his eyes, lost in the sea of his pupils.

""He internally roared, sure that he had just unwittingly done exactly what he did not want to do. He opened his mouth in surprise when he realized that there was no lock onto her spirit as there typically was when he engaged a human in his gaze.'

"This woman was different somehow. She wasn't affected by his gaze the way a normal human would be. She was beautiful, sensual, exquisite. He was drawn into her, feeling her own vision boring into his soul, or rather, what was left of it."
